

David Gordon is visiting professor at the University of Copenhagen, emeritus professor of medicine at the University of Manchester, and visiting professor at Queen Mary, University of London. He was dean of the medical faculty in Manchester for seven years. The medical faculty in Manchester is one of the largest in Europe, and includes schools of medicine, nursing, dentistry, pharmacy, and psychology. While dean in Manchester, he was also elected as chair of the Council of Heads of Medical Schools (now the Medical Schools Council), the representative body for all medical schools in the UK, particularly concerned with UK national policy for medical education and for medical schools, and with the interaction of medical schools with their parent universities.

After qualifying from the University of Cambridge, he held research, academic and clinical appointments in Leicester, Cambridge and London, working and publishing on renal and cardiovascular physiology, pathophysiology and epidemiology. He then joined the Wellcome Trust during the period of its expansion to become the world's largest endowed foundation, and the world's largest non-governmental funder of biomedical research.

At the University of Copenhagen he is consultant to the Avicenna project, which is jointly supported by the University of Copenhagen and by WHO, redeveloping the world-wide directories of educational institutions for medicine and the other academic professions in health-care.

He was elected to the AMSE Executive Committee in 2002 and as President of AMSE in 2004.